After Dulles, Who?

THERE IS A GROWING FEELING that Allen W. Dulles' days are numbered as head of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Mr. Dulles' CIA was named as at least a contributing factor to the Cuban invasion debacle. And since then the word in Washington has been "Dulles must go."

If so, who will head up the powerful and all-important CIA? Well, for what it's worth, the name of Robert F. Kennedy is being mentioned, and frequently.

The president's brother is a determined, loyal and smart-as-a-whip young man. But if he is appointed to head the CIA, the opposition will boom—you can count on that.

The opposition will hammer away on the theme that the younger Kennedy's loyalty to his older brother would be a handicap in such a position as head of the CIA because, as such, he should have no commitments of any kind to anyone.

We think JFK realizes that. And will act accordingly.
